NEW QUESTION: 1

The IT Security Analyst for a small organization is working on a customer's system and identifies a possible intrusion in a database that contains PII. Since PII is involved, the analyst wants to get the issue addressed as soon as possible. Which of the following is the FIRST step the analyst should take in mitigating the impact of the potential intrusion?

- A. Shut down the production network interfaces on the server and change all of the DBMS account passwords.
- B. Contact the local authorities so an investigation can be started as quickly as possible.
- C. Refer the issue to management for handling according to the incident response process.
- D. Disable the front-end web server and notify the customer by email to determine how the customer would like to proceed.

Answer: C

Explanation:

The database contains PII (personally identifiable information) so the natural response is to want to get the issue addressed as soon as possible. However, in this question we have an IT Security Analyst working on a customer's system. Therefore, this IT Security Analyst does not know what the customer's incident response process is. In this case, the IT Security Analyst should refer the issue to company management so they can handle the issue (with your help if required) according to their incident response procedures.

Incorrect Answers:

A: Contacting the local authorities so an investigation can be started as quickly as possible would not be the first step. Apart from the fact an investigation could take any amount of time; this action does nothing to actually stop the unauthorized access.

B: Shutting down the production network interfaces on the server and changing all of the DBMS account passwords may be a step in the company's incident response procedure. However, as the IT Security Analyst does not know what the customer's incident response process is, he should notify management so they can make that decision.

C: Disabling the front-end web server may or may not stop the unauthorized access to the database server. However, taking a company web server offline may have a damaging impact on the company so the IT Security Analyst should not make that decision without consulting the management. Using email to determine how the customer would like to proceed is not appropriate method of communication. For something this urgent, a face-to-face meeting or at least a phone call would be more appropriate.
